	PAGE
IX. Is philosophy possible as a science, and what are its conditions?—Giordano Bruno—Literary aristocracy, or the existence of a tacit compact among the learned as a privileged order—The author's obligations to the Mystics—To Immanuel Kant—The difference between the letter and the spirit of Kant's writings, and a vindication of prudence in the teaching of philosophy—Fichte's attempt to complete the critical system—Its partial success and ultimate failure—Obligations to Schelling; and among English writers to Saunarez	79
X. A chapter of digression and anecdotes, as an interlude preceding that on the nature and genesis of the imagination or plastic power—On pedantry and pedantic expressions—Advice to young authors respecting publication—Various anecdotes of the author's literary life, and the progress of his opinions in religion and politics	91
XI. An affectionate exhortation to those who in early life feel themselves disposed to become authors	127
XII. A chapter of requests and premonitions concerning the perusal or omission of the chapter that follows	134
XIII. On the imagination, or esemplastic power	161
[VOLUME II]
XIV. Occasion of the Lyrical Ballads , and the objects originally proposed—Preface to the second edition—The ensuing controversy, its causes and acrimony—Philosophic definitions of a poem and poetry with scholia	168
XV. The specific symptoms of poetic power elucidated in a critical analysis of Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis and Lucrece	175
XVI. Striking points of difference between the poets of the present age and those of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries—Wish expressed for the union of the characteristic merits of both	181
XVII. Examination of the tenets peculiar to Mr Wordsworth—Rustic life (above all, low and rustic life) especially unfavorable to the formation of a human diction—The best parts of language the products of philosophers, not of clowns or shepherds—Poetry essentially ideal and generic—The language of Milton as much the language of real life, yea, incomparably more so than that of the cottager	188
XVIII. Language of metrical composition, why and wherein essentially different from that of prose—Origin and elements of metre—Its necessary consequences, and the conditions thereby imposed on the metrical writer in the choice of his diction	201
XIX. Continuation—Concerning the real object which, it is probable, Mr Wordsworth had before him in his critical preface—Elucidation and application of this—The neutral style, or that common to prose and poetry, exemplified by specimens from Chaucer, Herbert, etc.	222
