Anatoly Sufronov, a well-known Soviet author, was a friend of Mikhail Sholokhov's for many years. Their first meeting took place before World War II, one of their latest ones—in August 1983. Throughout these years, Sufronov was closely following the work of the famous Soviet writer, trying not to miss any of his new publications, speeches or films based on his works. Sufronov describes his meetings with Sholokhov, the village of Vesenskaya where Sholokhov lived, and the writer's family and close friends. All these first-hand accounts are particularly valuable today, when interest in the personality of the great writer and his work is truly boundless.
