In 1965 300,000 road accidents were reported and nobody knows the number of other accidents in which nobody was hurt. Every one of these accidents caused death, injury, expense, or serious inconvenience. A very high proportion of them could have been avoided.

How?

John Howard's new handbook is designed to set the ordinary driver thinking for himself about a skill which can frequently keep the driver out of court or hospital and reduce the costs of motoring by the annual amount of his No-Claims Bonus.

'Roadspace', in John Howard's analysis, is the key to safe driving. His chapters on handling the car in every situation from skidding to parking are focused on the driver's technique and foresight in his use of 'roadspace': together they form an extremely comprehensive book on every aspect of 'normal' (i.e. non-competitive) driving in town and country, on motorways, at night, or abroad, in all weathers.
